BROOKE DAVIS

LOST & FOUND

AN INTRIGUING EXPLORATION OF LOSS & GRIEF

photograph by Ailsa Bowyer

Inspired by the sudden death of her mother, Brooke Davis wrote her debut novel Lost & Found as her thesis on grief for her Ph.D. A sensation that sparked a bidding war among publishers at the 2014 London Book Fair, the book explores what it means to grieve through the story of a seven-year-old girl and two octogenarians, each of whom has suffered devastating loss.

Millie's dog, Rambo, was her Very First Dead Thing. She found him by the side of the road on a morning when the sky seemed to be falling, fog circling his broken shape like a ghost. His jaw and eyes were wide open, as if mid-bark. His left hind leg pointed in a direction it normally didn't. The fog lifted around them, the clouds gathered in the sky, and she wondered if he was turning into rain. It was only when she dragged Rambo up to the house in her schoolbag that her mother thought to tell her how the world worked.

He's gone to a better place, her mother shouted at her while vacuuming the lounge room.

A better place?

What? Yes, heaven, love, haven't you heard of it? Don't they teach you anything in that bloody school? Lift your legs! It's doggy heaven, where there's eternal dog biscuits and they can poop wherever they please. Okay, legs down. I said, legs down! And they poop, I don't know, dog biscuits, so all they do is poop and eat dog biscuits, and run around and eat the other dogs' poop. Which are actually dog biscuits.

Millie took a moment. Why would they waste time here, then?

What? Well, they, um, have to earn it. They have to stay here until they get voted over to a better place. Like doggy Survivor.

So, is Rambo on another planet?

Well, yes. Sort of. I mean—you really haven't heard of heaven? How God sits up in the clouds and Satan's all underground and everything?

Can I get to Rambo's new planet?

Her mother switched off the vacuum cleaner and looked squarely at Millie. Only if you have a spaceship. Do you have a spaceship?

Millie looked at her feet. No.

Well, you can't get to Rambo's new planet then.

Days later, Millie discovered that Rambo was most definitely not on a new planet and was, in fact, in their backyard, buried halfheartedly under the Sunday Times. Millie carefully lifted the newspaper and saw Rambo but not-Rambo; a Rambo shrunken and eaten and wasting away. She snuck out every night from then on, to be with him while his body went from something into nothing.

The old man crossing the road had been her Second Dead Thing. After the car hit him, she watched him fly through the air and thought she saw him smile. His hat landed on top of the yield sign and his walking stick danced around the lamp-post. And then it had been his body, cracking against the curb. She pushed her way through all the legs and exclamation marks to kneel beside his face. She looked deeply into his eyes. He looked back at her like he was only a drawing. She ran her fingers over his wrinkles and wondered what he'd used each one for.

She was then lifted away from him and told to cover her eyes, because she was just a child. And as she wandered home the long way, she thought it might be time to ask her dad about people heaven.

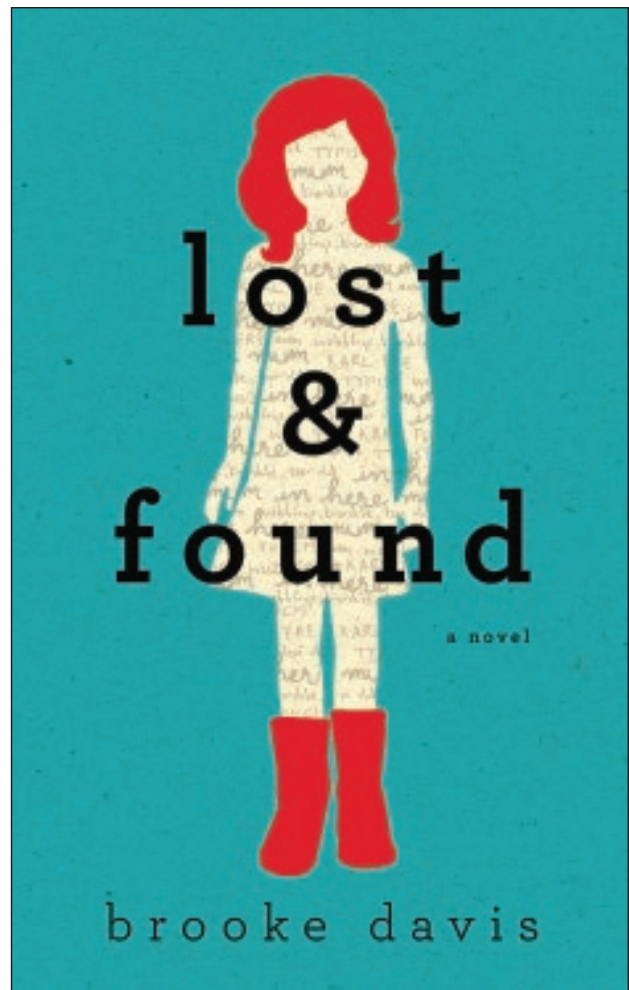

You see, Squirt, there's heaven, and then there's hell. Hell is where they send all the bad people, like criminals and con artists and parking inspectors. And heaven is where they send all the good people, like you and me and that nice blonde from Master-Chef.

What happens when you get there?

In heaven, you hang out with God and Jimi Hendrix, and you get to eat doughnuts whenever you want. In hell, you have to, uh . . . do the Macarena. Forever. To that "Grease Megamix."

Where do you go if you're good and bad?

What? I don't know. IKEA?

9780525954682 / $26.95 hardcover / Dutton Books

Will you help me make a spaceship?

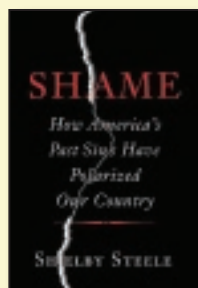

Hang on, Squirt. Can we finish this next ad break?

She soon noticed that everything was dying around her. Bugs and oranges and Christmas trees and houses and mailboxes and train rides and markers and candles and old people and young people and people in between. She wasn't to know that after she had recorded twenty-seven assorted creatures in her Book Of Dead Things—Spider, The Bird, Grandma, next door's cat Gertrude, among others—her dad would be a Dead Thing too. That she'd write it next to the number twenty-eight in letters so big they took up two pages: MY DAD. That, for a while, it was hard to know what to do other than stare at the letters until she couldn't remember what they meant. That she would do this, by flashlight, sitting in the hallway outside her parents' bedroom, listening to her mum pretending she was asleep.

ANIMALS / PETS

Bantam Chickens

Roland Ruthersdale

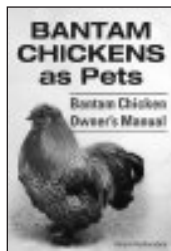

LSIG

Bantam Chickens are the most popular variety among current chicken owners. These miniature sized chickens are perfect in any urban set up. They are gentle, docile and easy to tame, making them the perfect options for pet owners. These birds are not exactly the most revered for their egg laying capabilities, but there is a lot more to them than that. 160 pp.

Mrs Mort's Madness

Suzanne Falkner

XAAA

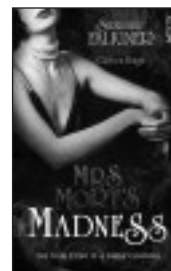

Foreword by Gideon Haigh

Four days before Christmas in 1920, Dorothy Mort shot her lover dead in cold blood, a tragic end to her affair with a dashing young doctor, cricket star and war hero. Declared not guilty on the ground of insanity, Dorothy was released nine years later, but was she really mad, just bad, or neither? And what was the secret that her husband kept for the rest of his life? 288 pp.

The New Creature

Discover the New Life Within

Fatai Kasali

LSIG

Kasali exposes the lifestyle of a natural man yet to be born-again. There are many Christians that claim that they are new creatures but a close examination of their lifestyle indicates otherwise. Though they claim to be born-again, they still live the life they used to live before giving their lives to Jesus Christ. As a new creature, a different lifestyle is expected. 148 pp.

MISS HAZEL AND THE ROSA PARKS LEAGUE

JONATHAN ODELL

TWO WOMEN AND A COUNTRY ON THE CUSP OF CIVIL RIGHTS

photograph by JimiKuehner

Originally published in 2004 as The View from Delphi, Odell's first novel captures the essence of life in small-town Mississippi in the 1950s as two women divided by race come together over similar losses and their mutual quests for dignity.

Miss Hazel and the Rosa Parks League is a story of complicated relationships between blacks and whites, their differences and their commonalities. What is it about that dynamic that speaks so strongly to you that it's been the focus of two of your novels?

Northerners have a hard time understanding segregation in the South. Typically they believe that it was a time when blacks and whites were kept physically separate. But my home state of Mississippi consists primarily of small towns, sometimes half black and half white. Regardless of how public institutions, bus lines, churches, and service providers adhered to the color line, it was impossible to really separate blacks from whites. We were deeply involved in each other's lives—in our kitchens, in our yards, in the downtown stores. We breathed each other's oxygen. My adopted home of Minneapolis is much more segregated now than Mississippi has been in its entire history. You see, to make Jim Crow work, or the systematic oppression of any people, it was not as critical to physically separate blacks and whites as it was to psychologically separate us. White kids are taught very early not to see blacks—not as human beings. In a thousand seemingly benign ways, I was taught to see them not as individuals but as functionaries—maids, fieldworkers, nursemaids, “those people.” They existed in the psychological background of my life, always present but never distinct. I strongly believe that white Americans, especially those of us Southerners who grew up during the Jim Crow era, possess certain brokenness, a perceptual handicap that affects the way we grasp the world. Most of the time we don't question it because it works so well for us. Someone smarter than I said, "Perception is mostly seeing what we believe rather than believing what we see." Before I began this book, I interviewed over 100 Black Mississippians to discover the extent of my own blindness, the ways that I talk myself into feeling superior and making them invisible. They were generous and patient with me. Their stories helped me begin to heal, to see with new eyes. That is why I wanted to write this book—to tell the story of how one first learns not to see, and then the process of at least beginning to question that convenient blindness.

You're becoming known for your strong female characters. How difficult (or easy) is it for you—a white man from a small town in Mississippi—to write from a female perspective?

I wish I could say I planned it. In fact, I started out thinking that since I was a man, I should write from a man's point of view. I tried and my characters were rigid, uninspired, and frankly quite boring. It wasn't until a writing teacher gave me permission to take the two women in my first draft, who seemed much more fascinating than the men, and write a chapter from each of their heads that the novel took shape. When these women began talking, they wouldn't shut up. They were fully developed, funny, tragic, and fiery and seemed to have a will of their own. I didn't have to drag them from scene to scene. I had to run to catch them. They of course became Hazel and Vida, the major characters in Miss Hazel and the Rosa Parks League. I think that's because when I was a kid, it was the women I loved listening to. While the men sat out on the porch at family reunions smoking cigarettes and reciting cotton prices and football scores in as few words as possible and mostly without even looking at each other, the women were in the kitchen cooking, laughing, joking, crying, and telling family stories. In their storytelling, I sensed that even though they told the same stories from year to year, they were saying, "This is who we are as a people. This is where you come from." Somebody said, if you want the facts ask a man. If you want the story, ask a woman. That was true in my clan. So I come by it honestly. These women's voices were the soundtrack of my childhood. I love them dearly and never again will I refuse them residence in my head. And any writer will tell you, it really doesn't matter if you have "the right" to speak from another gender, race, ethnicity, or whatever. Writers should feel blessed when any voice comes at all. We need to listen to who shows up with something to say. They are there for a reason. Our job as writers is not to worry about if we have the right, but if we get it right.

In your research for this novel and for The Healing, you came to realize that while the civil rights spotlight was on the men, the real “agitators” were the women. What created the situation of “men at the podiums, women on their feet” as you refer to it?

I think there are multiple reasons. One is the nature of the violence during that time. Black men were constantly in the crosshairs. Face it, most of racism in the South stems from white fear that black men want white women (and the deep insecurity that it could be reciprocal!). So the focus of white paranoia was on black men. They were the ones whites had to keep any eye, so the risk was higher for them to overtly resist. Black women were the lowest of the low as for perceived power and threat to white superiority. They could get a lot of things done their men could not because they were more “invisible.” They had jobs that took them into the most intimate spaces of the white life. They could come and go more freely. They could pool information, influence through personal relationship with white women. They were uniquely positioned to subvert white power, but it was from the shadows.

And of course patriarchy exists in the black community just as it does in the white community. The public spokespeople for African Americans have historically been male just as they had been for whites. In the 1950’s and 60’s, if white male leaders were going to deal directly with anyone it would have to be black leaders who were also male. “Man to Man.” That was the culture. Newspapers, TV, radio, all the communication channels that African Americans needed to get their message out were necessarily looking for the black male spokesperson for the real story. The country as a whole wasn’t ready to see women of any race as leaders of a legitimate movement. The credible face on the evening news needed to be a Martin Luther King, not a Rosa Parks.

So it may have been a necessary convention, but the tragedy is that still we give those public male faces most of the credit, when it was an army of women who assumed the lion’s share of the risk and got the job done. That’s not a new story, and unfortunately, not a defunct one.

Running is very important to Hazel. Running from her appearance by becoming adept with makeup. Seeing the Mississippi Delta for the first time and realizing it doesn’t afford her places to run and hide. Realizing after the birth of her first son that there’s nowhere to run from the responsibility. Then after a lifetime of wanting to run from things, she finds herself running toward something—the civil rights movement. Can you talk a little about that transformation?

I’m not sure Hazel was running toward the civil rights movement. With Vida and the maids, Hazel discovered a way for the best of her to shine, to be appreciated outside the roles that had been forced upon her. That’s all she ever wanted, to be seen and loved for who she was, even before she herself knew who she was. But she kept finding herself in these rigid stereotypical 50’s roles of mother and housewife that threatened to stifle the life from her. She knew there was more to her than that; she just didn’t know what it was. She was running, but running away from what in her heart she knew she wasn’t meant to be. Like Hazel herself said, “Seems like I’m always being hitched up to somebody else’s plow. When am I going to get a little acreage to call my own?”

Vida and the maids, on the other hand, allowed her to be just a crazy white woman and didn’t expect any more of her than that. With that freedom from conventional expectations, she found her footing and surprised herself at how capable she could be. Hazel probably would have followed them anywhere. The civil rights movement just happened to be on the way.

And when Hazel did take a stand against injustice, it wasn’t spurred by some broad humanitarian principle. She simply didn’t want her friend to be treated badly. That is the way great transformations begin, not at the level of principle or philosophy, but at the level of relationship. We all know this intuitively. Lasting change is born of love.

Vida also undergoes tremendous change from someone with a deep hatred of whites to someone who seems to have an honest friendship with a white woman and her son. Which of the two women had the easier transformation?

I’m not sure I can say who had the easier. That would make a great group discussion question.

What I can say is that like Hazel, Vida’s biggest challenge was forgiving herself for an unforgivable act—losing a child. Yes, Vida had been victimized horribly, and had legitimate reasons to hate all white people, but ultimately, it was her feeling that she herself was to blame for not keeping her child safe that shaped most of her perceptions. What Hazel extended to her was not friendship—Vida didn’t want her friendship. Being a friend to a white woman in those days just meant more work. What Hazel gave her, without knowing it, was permission to forgive herself for losing Nate. At that moment, Hazel became not a white woman, but another grieving mother, the only person who could ever have the moral authority to offer absolution. First they gave each other permission to forgive themselves, and then came the possibility of friendship.

In a moment of lucidity, old Maggie talks about receiving a dime from a gubernatorial candidate who pledged to send all the “colored folks” back to Africa. She holds on to it, waiting for the day when she can “come to town and spend it free and proud.” If that day were to come, would she actually spend it?

Maggie is the wisdom that sleeps within us all, waiting for that clear sounding note of a new day. I imagine, without knowing the why’s of the matter, when it comes time to spend that dime, Maggie will intuitively know not to spend it on herself but will hand it off to a grandbaby or a perhaps a great niece, some youth with the future still shining bright in her eyes, and bequeath to her a sounding note to listen for that someday will awaken her to take hold of providence.

What was the most difficult part of this novel to write? What flowed easiest?

The hardest was finding a believable way for two women, one white and one black, who were raised to distrust one another, to become, if not friends, at least allies. I did not want to rely on the “White Savior” trope to bring them together. That’s when a benevolent white person saves the unfortunate black victim, to her lasting gratitude. My black friends call that the “Killing

“In their storytelling, I sensed that even though they told the same stories from year to year, they were saying, ‘This is who we are as a people. This is where you come from.’” the Mockingbird Syndrome” and remind me that blacks have been saving themselves from the very beginning, thank you very much. Blacks have plenty of their own heroes. I wanted to work within the reality of the blatant injustice of the time, but I didn’t want to reduce the black characters to helpless victims and stereotypes, denying them their hard-won role in their own salvation. The method I hit upon was the common loss of a child—only another mother can know the kind of grief and self-blame results. If I wrote it right, that shared experience might bridge their differences—not erase them, but allow each to see the other’s humanity. In the end, they realize they need each other to heal. Accepting that we need other broken people to heal our own brokenness is humbling. It is the great equalizer.

The easiest was the dialogue. Whenever I would get stuck, I would just put Vida and Hazel in a room and let them have it. And where they went always surprised me. They still have conversations in my head.

What do you hope readers take away from this novel?

I often speak in somber tones about certain themes in my book, like race. I’m afraid I might scare some folks away with such serious talk. No one wants to be hit over the head with a morality lesson or slog through 400 pages of tragedy, injustice, and ruin. I want to say that even though the book deals with race, it is much more how certain things can transcend race. It’s about friendship, marriage, family, feminism, grieving the loss of children, redemption, and even a little spirituality thrown in because I’m a Southerner and I can’t get away from it. I also love that readers tell me that it’s not a grim tale, but one that shows a sense of humor.

Mostly I want folks to remember that they had a great time reading the story. That they laughed out loud and were often surprised and found delight in the new characters they got to meet.

Will there be a sequel?

The biggest request I’ve had from readers is to let them know what happened with Johnny and Nate as they grew to be men. I’d like to do that someday. I’ll keep checking in with Vida and Hazel, to see if they have any ideas. They’re thinking on it. I couldn’t do it without their full-throated support. They own this story.

In North Toward Home, Mississippi author and magazine editor Willie Morris comes to peace with the South by leaving it. You’ve also left the South. How have your novels helped you come to terms with your past—or have they?

When I began writing novels about the South, I was estranged from not only the South but my immediate family. I had moved to Minnesota, did my best to put my past behind me, and tried to remake myself into an urbane liberal, unprejudiced, gay and proud—the antithesis of what I considered the typical Mississippian. In fact when I began the first book, it was going to be my way of getting even with everyone who had ever done me wrong—my parents, my preachers, the racists who gave my state such a bad name. It was basically a poorly disguised hit piece. I even named the poor little neglected boy Johnny, so my mother would not miss the point.

But the more I looked beyond my personal agenda and the need to justify my resentments, and opened myself up to the truth, the more I found a much more complex proposition—and a humbling one. The things I said I hated about the South were the things that I couldn’t accept about myself. It’s easier to point the finger at someone else’s racism, homophobia, or religious intolerance than to look at your own—the log in your own eye. It’s easier to focus on people’s sins than their humanity. The things I despised about my family, about the South, were the things I had not acknowledged about myself.

Writing fiction is a dangerous thing—or it is if you are doing it honestly. To write good fiction, you have to find a vein of truth and mine it ruthlessly, go wherever it leads you, and it inevitably leads back to you, to those places that have remained unexplored in your own soul. Otherwise you are not writing, you are pontificating. Someone said the writer’s job is not to declare but to discover. Fiction requires that you look beyond the facts as you know them. Because facts often have little to do with the truth.

Following my characters, continually asking myself, “What would I do in that situation?” brought me to a place of not only making peace with the South, but to falling in love with the bigger truth of it. For good or ill, I am the South and the South is me.
