ANCIENT EGYPT MEETS GAME OF THRONES
IN A NEW TRILOGY

“Delayed?” the queen moaned as her labor pains intensified. “For the birth of a king? They had better be dead!”

In the launch title of an epic new trilogy, four strangers—a princess, a young priestess, a rebel, and a tomb robber—are ripped from their lives and thrown into a conflict with an ancient enemy. Amid murder and betrayal, magic and monsters, gods and visions, love and war, these four unlikely heroes find themselves connected by a forgotten oracle that whispers insistently across the land. Only together can they save the kingdom from destruction, but when the bloodshed is done, who of Khetara’s children will sit on the throne?

Prologue

Paws

The heat inside the chamber was oppressive, the air salty with sweat. There was a table, and a low bed painted in gold. In the center of the chamber, a naked woman squatted on two large bricks placed hip’s width apart on the tile floor. Her copper skin glistened. Attendants in white sheath dresses flanked her on either side, mopping her brow as she cried out with that unearthly noise. Her belly hung between her legs, as large and round as the moon.

One of the attendants nodded rhythmically, murmuring, “Make strong her heart, and keep safe the child. Make strong her heart, and keep safe the child...”

The other attendant was silent, her eyes flicking back and forth between her lady and the door. She was a solid girl, her thick, calloused hands supporting the woman’s body with unwavering strength.

As the naked woman’s cry faded to silence, the attendant took a deep breath. “Your vapors have gone cold, my queen,” she said, indicating the dish of water positioned between the birthing bricks. “Shall I fetch you more hot water? Perhaps it will ease your suffering.”

The queen panted, a single bead of sweat clinging to the tip of her nose. “The only thing that will ease my suffering,” she growled, “is the arrival of my nurse. Where is she, Nebet? Where are the priests? It’s an ill omen for a child to be born without the gods’ words in his ears, but I cannot wait much longer.”

Nebet looked desperate. “I don’t know, my queen. This storm is unlike anything I’ve experienced before. Even for the growing season. Perhaps the nurse and the others are caught in its grip and have been delayed—”

“Delayed?” the queen moaned as her labor pains intensified. “For the birth of a king? They had better be dead!” Her face twisted in agony, and she began to wail once more. Nebet and the other attendant winced and held the queen’s arms tighter as the pain crested, then ebbed.

Once she could speak again, the queen gasped, “Open the curtain! I cannot breathe!”

“But the storm!” the other attendant protested.

“Curse the storm,” the queen spat. “Open it now!”

“Yes, Queen Bintanath.”

The girl scurried to the window, leaving Nebet to support the queen alone. The attendant threw the window curtain aside, allowing a humid breeze to blow through the chamber. The queen sighed with relief, her body sagging heavily against Nebet, who struggled to hold her weight until the other girl resumed her post.

"Ah... that feels good," the queen muttered.

"Queen Bintanath..." Nebet said warily, after kneeling to peer between the woman's legs.

"What? What is it?" the queen asked. Her eyelids drooped with exhaustion.

"I'm afraid I can see the baby's head. There is no more time."

The queen gritted her teeth. "No," she said, a note of despair in her voice. "It can't happen this way. It's not right... A king needs his blessings—he needs his gods-given name! Where are they, Nebet?"

Nebet turned to look at the door once more, her eyes narrow, beseeching, as if she were manifesting a savior to walk through it by sheer force of will.

Another strong breeze blew into the chamber. It lifted the door curtain, sending it billowing into the corridor beyond. At the same moment, three women entered the room. Two were tall and willowy—one dark, one fair—their hair fashionably dyed deep blue. The third was short and sun-weathered, her mottled skin covered in warts. All three women wore long white gowns, belts of turquoise and lapis, and beaded headdresses over their plaited hair.

Queen Bintanath jerked up her head to look at them, her expression first of relief, then of confusion. "Who are you?" she demanded. "How dare you enter this chamber without my leave!"

"Calm yourself, dear lady," the short one said, her voice low and graveled. Her right breast hung over the scoop of her gown and swung gently as she approached the queen. "We are here to help."

The queen's confusion only deepened. "Help? Did Nurse send you?"

The fair one smiled, her blue lotus-colored eyes crinkling. "We were sent, yes," she said.

The queen looked from one woman to the other, still suspicious. "You don't look like nurses..."

"My sister and I are mother to many children," the dark one added softly. Despite the difference in their eyes—hers were obsidian black—the two women looked quite similar. "And our companion has attended innumerable births. We are but simple dancers, my lady, visiting from afar—but if you trust us, we will help you welcome your children to this world."

"Children?" the queen asked, puzzled by the plurality.

The short one nodded. "Not one, but three."

The queen opened her mouth, perhaps to deny this, but what came out instead was a deep moan. "It's coming again," she cried, "It's happening too fast." The pain drove whatever protest she might have made from her mind. "Yes, help me," she begged them. "By the gods, help me!"

Without a word, the three women moved with graceful, practiced movements—the fair one before the queen, the dark one behind, like a shadow, and the short one positioned low, her leathery hands reaching between the laboring woman's legs. Nebet and the other attendant backed away, wide-eyed and awed by the three strange dancers.

As waves of agony crashed over the queen, unrelenting now, the short woman croaked a command:

"Push!"

The queen gripped the fair one's arms, squeezed her eyes shut, and screamed.

Before and behind her, the sisters held her and swayed, whispering words unknowable.

"Push!"

The queen took a ragged breath and screamed again. Moments later, a small, fleshy bundle dropped into the short woman's hands and let out a lusty cry. Taking a piece of sharpened flint from her belt, she cut the cord and handed the wet, squalling infant to the dark one.

"A boy," the dark one said, gazing at the child with those flashing midnight eyes. "Meryamun—He Whose Face Is the Sun."

The attendants gaped at each other in shock. To not only deliver the new king, but to name him? Everyone knew that honor was reserved for the high priest of Amun. Who were these women to demonstrate such brazen heresy?

But the queen, still in the throes of labor, gave no protest. "The pain, why has it not ceased?" she cried out instead.

The short one reached once more between the queen's legs. "Because you are not done, my lady. Now, again—push!"

The queen roared and bore down, her toes curling into the bricks beneath her feet. Within moments, another baby was delivered into the short woman's speckled hands. Cutting the cord, she handed the second child to the fair sister.

"A girl," the fair one said, smiling as the baby cooed. "Sitamun, She Who Knows All the Names."

The queen's body went slack, and she crumpled. The two attendants rushed to her side, grasping her by the shoulders. They made to carry her toward the bed, but the short woman stopped them. "Not yet," she said huskily. "There is one more."

Queen Bintanath looked up and shook her head. "The pain is gone now. How can there be another?"

The short one shrugged. "Perhaps this one takes the pain onto himself." Reluctantly, the queen stepped back onto the birthing bricks and resumed her position. "Please, my lady. Push."

Still perplexed, Queen Bintanath closed her eyes and tensed.

The short one reached out just as a child, smaller than the first two, fell into her open palms. The infant was silent as she cut the cord.

"Is he all right?" the queen asked, peering down anxiously.

The short one gathered the small child into her own arms, giving him her finger to suckle. He gazed up at her with a tiny serious face. "He is fine. Another healthy boy. Bakenamun, He Whose Heart Is Hidden."

The queen gave a deep sigh and smiled, contented. Outside, the driving rain washed the world clean and made it quiet with a mother's hush. INGRAM
